

Stacy Ferratti believes that anyone can learn to present themselves in a way that is interesting and effective, and that there is no excuse for boring presentations or ineffective communications. Her mission is to help people be clear, concise, and compelling when communicating, whether in presentations, meetings, or one on one.

Stacy teaches and coaches people at all organizational levels to engage audiences, be heard, and have impact. She is committed to helping people to discover what is authentic in both their content and style, and to design their communication so that people receive the message.

She has trained and coached thousands of senior leaders, engineers, and salespeople, among others. Her direct and humorous coaching style creates a dynamic coaching and learning environment.

She has conducted programs nationally, internationally, and virtually with clients that include Microsoft, Oracle, Cisco, Hewlett Packard, Bank of America, Kaiser Permanente, Equinix, US Pharmaceuticals, and Grant Thornton, among many others. Over the years, she has also worked with the federal government, school systems, and non-profit organizations.

Stacy has a degree in Mass Communication from Boston University. Her first career was as a graphic designer, and she brings that skill to helping people communicate effectively. She loves neuroscience, meditation, and personal growth and uses her knowledge and experience to bring out the best in her clients. She lives in the San Francisco Bay area.
